Summary:

You will work in an interdisciplinary environment at the interface of social scientific theory and policy, and with a concern for justice, whether social, environmental or spatial. You should be able to demonstrate potential to achieve international research excellence in one or more of the following themes: values in planning; planning ideas; practices and policy frameworks; the making of places; government practices and governance; economies; markets and the state, or spatial knowledge and analyses. You will teach on undergraduate and postgraduate courses, and supervise doctoral students. A PhD in a relevant subject area (or equivalent experience) is essential, so will need proven teaching ability.

The post is available from 1 September 2010.
